Wat Phra Si Rattana Satsadaram

As we sought refuge from the scorching sun, the aged monk and I engaged in a deep and meaningful conversation.

Our minds were consumed by a revolutionary concept I had unveiled, which explored the simultaneous existence of life and death.

We pondered the intricate dynamics of this theory, envisioning a thin, ethereal barrier that regulated the boundaries between these two fundamental states. Yet, we contemplated the extraordinary notion that occasionally, under certain circumstances, these realms could momentarily merge, like a delicate dance, if an immobile object were to experience a sudden jolt or disruption in its magnetic field - a concept often depicted in popular culture.

The elderly monk, much like numerous scholars who have delved into the intricacies of co-existence, conveyed a profound sense of worry that verged on sheer alarm regarding the possibility of a disruption that could ultimately cause a complete breakdown of the personal magnetic field (Aura), culminating in a convergence of multiverse gravitational forces.

Confidently, I countered his worry by asserting that numerous esteemed scientists have refuted the quantum aspect of his argument, instead embracing the notion that any collapse would only occur upon individual observation.

Furthermore, if there is no observer present, it simply will not happen.

However, recent studies on plasma have suggested an intriguing revelation - it appears that there exists a quantum life force within plasma that possesses an awareness of being observed by you.

After thoroughly examining the recent White Papers, I arrived at a definitive conclusion that is closely intertwined with their findings.
These comprehensive reports indicate that there is a lack of concrete evidence to support any claims, apart from anecdotal studies, regarding individuals who may or may not possess a sound mental state or a firm grasp on reality.

Upon careful observation,
I have come to realize that my perspective differs from their findings.

In my view, time can be seen as a deceptive concept that was incorporated during the alteration of the DNA of the First CIS Humans.
This modification aimed to establish a rigid indicator, commonly referred to as a biological clock, which counts down an individual's lifespan.

Its purpose is to rectify the initial oversight that unintentionally bestowed upon us an extended lifespan inherited from our DNA donors. Looking back, it's evident that we've become ensnared in the age-old trap of retrospective theory when discussing this matter, leading us to a point where meaningful conversations veer sharply off course and into a tangled mess of confusion and complexity.

Due to various legal concerns and ongoing restraining orders, I refrained from sharing a significant piece of information. Recently, I managed to unlock my HFM (Harmonic Frequency Modulator) through a dark web shop. This particular model had been recalled in the consumer edition.

The purpose behind unlocking the regulator restrictions in my home/consumer unit was to conduct a non-peer reviewed study.

Surprisingly, the initial results of this study suggest that the existence of a membrane barrier can be breached by simply modulating my frequency to match that of the membrane itself.
This breakthrough allowed me to transcend into a different existence, possibly in the past or future.

Consequently, it has become evident that death is merely a transition into a different frequency, which could potentially indicate another innate characteristic hardwired into our DNA.

Unfortunately, the progress of transitioning into the alternate frequency was hindered by the significant power requirements necessary to sustain the frequency lock. Regrettably, my pursuit of further research has been temporarily halted as the local power company disconnected my electricity last week.
